Capoeira, also understood as process of Afro-Brazilian culture, tells its story and its followers' stories and has religiosity as one of the constituting pillars of its social imaginary. Instruments such as berimbau and atabaque, besides marking the rhythm of the game, lend their sacred attributes and are worshipped in the circle, music and chant are symbolic elements telling stories and legends of Gods, Orixás and enchanted entities who, along with the dominant Catholicism, comprise the syncretism which founded a peculiar religiosity to cultural manifestations from Africans and their descendents in Brazil.

Teves (1992) points out that investigating a social reality is telling, with a coordinate set of representations, a structure of senses, of meanings which circulate among its members through different forms of languages: this set is the social imaginary which can be expressed in various human productions, giving us clues of the social relations established within the groups. Therefore, when unveiling some aspects of the sacredness in capoeira game, we do hope to contribute to the understanding of the symbolic plots which comprise this element's imaginary of body culture, highly marked by religious aspects.

Pierre Ansart (1978), anthropologist and scholar of social imaginaries, claims that religion replaces myth in the explanations about the world and its order justifying the reasons of being of social existence. "Religion points to the desirable, orders the individual actions for the achievement of fair desires, praises the supreme forms of personal achievement" (p.31). While myth extends the omnipresence of its practices and meanings over all the group, religion ranks these very practices, granting the chosen ones the power to conserve the common meanings and to inculcate to the others through the dogmas which represent the unquestionable truths inside religious discourse. Let us see how capoeira reflects in its practices sacred and ritualistic aspects which comprise its practitioners' religiosity.

Capoeira and its religiosity

... Olha o jogo, a mandinga e oração capoeira é religião (...)

It is widely known that capoeira has survived keeping in its composition characteristic aspects of the Brazilian religious syncretism, composed of Indian, African and Portuguese values. Some punch names as 'benção' and 'crúz' were borrowed from Catholicism while others were extracted from umbanda, similar to 'Xangô' and 'encruzilhada'; there are beats made by berimbau which are named after catholic saints, such as 'Santo Bento grande', 'São Bento pequeno' and 'Santa Maria' and chants which praise the orixás, saints and other illuminated entities, revealing aspects of the sacredness inherent to this game.

For many masters, capoeira is seen as religion, bridging through the ritual of the circle, the orun, which in nagô culture represents the mythical space wherein the Gods live and very much alike other peoples' paradise, and the aiê, world of the mortal, like earth for the westerns (Ogebeara, 1998). We understand this link between the sacredness and the profane in the light of Eliade (1996) when he says that human existence is only possible thanks to the permanent communication with heaven. In capoeiras' narratives we can find this imaginary: "capoeira is a form of entering communion with God. When we are fighting it is like there is nothing else around us but the universe. There is a great integration between us and the cosmic conscience" (Mestre Touro, 1989).

In the analysis of this imaginary which comprises capoeira, time arises as a singular experience insofar as it also points to a dimension of the sacred, contrary to chronological time stated by western society. In his notion of sacred time, we refer to Eliade (1996) as the one who leads to a reversible and recoverable circularity, a kind of eternal mythical present which man reintroduces periodically by the language of the rites. It is common, in capoeira circles, to prevail the axé time, which, for the nagô culture means the invisible strength, the magic-sacred strength of all divinity, of all animated being, of everything. (Rego, 1968). For the capoeira practitioners, this axé arises as the sense of the positive energy which animates and contaminates the capoeira game (Squisito apud Lima 2005).

According to Reis (2000), the access to the sacred time demands a price: be baptized in capoeira and enter the circle, "the capoeira practitioners pay symbolically, that is, they buy the game..." (p.171). The circle can have its time enlarged or reduced due to the presence or lack of this axé. Some masters consider this sensibility of energy perception as one of the main rationales of capoeira, born by only a few. It is said that the energy causes visible signs to the masters as when the circle is good, with good games, happy chant, good rhythm and mandinga., it has axé; otherwise, the circle becomes heavy and its reflexes can be notorious for the most demanding

Mestre Mendonça believes that the capoeira circle has its own energy. The circle, according to him, is composed of people who, in one circle, form an energetic field commanded by the berimbau and that, besides acting in the rhythmic part of the game, denotes sacred attributes to the capoeira circle. The berimbau is an African instrument which, in its homeland, is known as urucungo and has for the black slaves the power of communication with the spirit of the dead and ancestors, besides healing the banzo. Silva (2003) sees the berimbau as sacred and worshiped by everyone, of the regional or angola modalities and that, taken to the religion scope, it protects and "listens to" all capoeira practitioners who believes in it.

Maybe is why it is common to hear in the context of capoeira sentences such as: "if you turn your back to capoeira, it will surely turn against you", or else, "it's the capoeira that chooses you and not you that chooses it" (King, 2006, p.9). It is worth noticing that this sense of choice is also found in candomblé. José Beniste (2003) explains that, by choosing a physical space for the implementation of a terreiro, "it is not its leader who chooses the space to install its premises, but rather the space which chooses her through its òrisá" (p.46).

Capoeira groups are very often named after catholic saints or orixás from umbanda and candomblé such as: Irmãos Unidos de São Jorge, Capoarte de Obaluaê, São Bento pequeno, Inaiê de laoca among others which comprise the universe of capoeira. In some groups, we can find rituals, stories and codes typical of Afro-Brazilian religious cults. Brito (2004) argues that there is no point denying the link between capoeira and religion as the chants provide for this link, talking about catholic saints and orixás from the nagô culture.

Coelho (2000) agrees and claims that:

What is outstanding in the case of the African religions is the process, which is similar to the capoeira rhythm: most of the stories, chants in honor of the orixás sung in terreiros, can be also sung in the capoeira circles. But it is not only in this aspect that there is proximity between the religion and capoeira: the social environment is the same and so are their practitioners.

However, more important than the similarity of the environment and the agent, it is the initial process present in both, process which turns them co-authors of a sole drama (p. 80).

The Afro-Brazilian musicality portrays in its imaginary its myths of creation, its legends, its beliefs and its religiosity. As to capoeira, some stories are either literally sung or adapted to be used in the circles. They often narrate facts occurred according to the mythological Afro-Brazilian universe, its journey is re-visited and each story is praised to their orixás, its legends, their beliefs and their myths seem to gain life each time they are evoked in their rites. "(...) Beira mar auê Beira mar, Beira mar auê Beira mar, é sentinela de oxum é remador de Iemanjá o nosso pai é Ogum é general Beira mar (...)" (Anonymous).

Still in the perspective of the religiosity present in the capoeira circles, Silva (2003) considers the possibility of its being regarded a religion for its followers as, according to the author, "(...) we could think that capoeira is exclusively linked to a cult of its own thus becoming a religion or sect exclusive to the capoeira practitioners" (p. 93). There are chants which support this argument, as we can see here:

My master told me one day, hey boy, pay attention, I'll teach you capoeira, have much devotion, capoeira is an art which one learns with the heart, it takes time to play capoeira, and this time will take long, keep on growing up well trained so as your body can improve, my life is capoeira, but I am capoeira. Look at the swing, mandinga and pray, capoeira is religion (Anonymous).

It seems that in the chant, one of the senses attributed to capoeira is priesthood, with sacred initiation rites, time of grief, body and spiritual preparation and above all religion. The masters seem to give sense to its practice, honoring their saints, orixás and capoeira itself, playing the role of real priests of this art which, as to the chant, "one learns with the heart". For the capoeira practitioner, his life seems to mix with his own capoeira, this passage appears regularly in many other chants, reinforcing the representation in the practitioners' imaginary, or rather, the option for this modality as a philosophy of life.

Nestor Capoeira (1997) grants capoeira a "magical strength" capable of linking practitioners of the present and of the past by means of an energetic temporal chain which seems to open during the rite of circle, updating heroic deeds of past master and characters in a kind of ritual temporality. The author also argues:

We could even imagine capoeira as an entity which protects and opens a path to those who place themselves under its shadow- or else, its light! Capoeira- in the imagination of many practitioners- would be a feminine entity similar to a pomba-gira of candomblé and umbanda (p.127).

The entity mentioned by the author as pomba-gira belongs to the Afro-Brazilian mythological pantheon categorized as the feminine principle of 'street people or Exu'. In the imaginary, it is not rare to find relations of capoeira and capoeira practitioners with the mythical figure of Exu. Decânio (apud Araújo, 1999) describes similarities between the swing of capoeira and that of Exu orixá's dances in candomblé. There is also a kind of Exu in the Afro-Brazilian religious universe that embodies the mythical figure of the malandro: Zé Pelintra ou just Zé, as it is known by umbanda followers. His representation is an always very well-dressed mulato in his white linen suit, double-colored shoes, red carnation in the lapel, Panama hat and red silk scarf around the neck to protect razor attacks. Ligiéro (2004) states that:

Zé Pelintra has also become capoeira patron because many of the Exus from his group would have belonged to the malandro circles of old Lapa, in Rio de Janeiro: Zé malandro, Terno branco, Camisa preta, Carioquinha, Zé Pretinho, Gargalhada and Zé das Mulheres make up the mythological "kingdom of malandro" (p.64).

For umbanda followers, during the ritual the entities manifest themselves through the embodiment of sacred spirits in its respective mediuns, as are called the sectarian religious people, and present themselves according to their mythical characteristics. The Exus cited by Ligiéro (2004) make up a falange guided by Zé Pelintra who, according to the Afro-Brazilian mythology, lived in old Lapa in the state of Rio de Janeiro, and belonged to a group of malandros that, for the author:

For anyone to belong to this select group of high class malandro, one had to be good at fighting. Enter the capoeira circle ou 'batuqueiros' to prove one understood about malice and escape, was a compulsory baptism. Only then, the malandro got a degree to be recognized as master, a real bama (p.65).

Zé Pelintra can be regarded the archetype of this "Brazilian malandro", good at capoeira, beloved pimp by several women, being supported by many of them, bohemian and a good dancer, never without his razor and his patuá, indispensable elements to cheat the establishment ordered by the dominant. During the umbanda religious ritual, the figure of Zé Pelintra manifest itself in the terreiro with movements and gestures which lead us to the capoeira practice reinforcing the imaginary of a sacred entity that practices and protects capoeira.

It is interesting to point out that this Afro-Brazilian religious perspective is not the only one within the universe of capoeira as there are capoeira groups whose masters are catholic and from other religions. From the nineties on arises a group known as 'evangelic capoeira', which in contrast with the Afro-Brazilian religious roots, suggests a series of changes which will act on the symbolism of capoeira ritual.

Some of these changes include: the withdrawal of atabaque which, for some evangelic masters, has strong links with umbanda and candomblé; the beats of berimbau with the name of catholic saints are few or almost never used by some of these masters because, according to their religious beliefs, catholic saints do not hold sacred representation and there is only one God possible for all, different from the phrase "...I viva meu Deus carnará" sung in capoeira circles. For some masters, the phrase can lead to the existence of more than one God, which is contrary to their doctrine.

Another emblematic difference happens in the baptism, a rite created by Mestre Bimba which initiates the capoeira practitioner in the 'world of capoeira'. Traditionally, applicant students play with masters, counter-masters or graduate students and receive, at the end of the game, his 'nickname' which will follow him throughout his journey in the modality. For some evangelic capoeira masters, the term 'baptized' leads to a sacred ritual and using this name could profane some of the group's precept and the nicknames, both of them would be unworthy of capoeira practitioners.

The capoeira teacher known as Moreno points out that "the initiation of the evangelic capoeira practitioner, for example, is called by some in the début, in the place of baptism, a word incorporated of the catholic liturgy". (Moreno apud Lima, 2005, p.35). Mano Lima also brings us the idea of using capoeira as an instrument able to evangelize through classes and rites adapted for this purpose such as: songs made to praise God and even the creation of the "capoeira practitioners church which gathers people from various congregations" (Lima 2005) in Goiânia.

We can perceive that the religiosity is intimately linked to capoeira practice and capoeira practitioners, being expressed in chants and in the existing symbolism in its rites. Therefore, religion, through its symbolic traces not only permeates the capoeira practitioners' universe and through its codes reinforces but even constitutes an efficient symbolic language in the ideological viewpoint, strengthening the bonds of belonging and the social imaginary within the group.
